distracted by smoking or poor health or bullies, they can perform well in their classes."

Margaret Hoffman, principal of Fort Wright Elementary, said her school's participation in Steps to Respect, an anti-bullying program, benefited both the students and teachers.

"It was good because it made the students a lot more aware of what bullying is and it gave kids and teachers the strategies to help when dealing with bullies," she said. "Teachers are not always going to be around to help students and the children learned the proper assertive responses to stop the bullying and the information to be able to discern the difference between reporting bullying and tattletailing."
